PHILOSOPHY AND GOALS

My coaching interest is to develop young athletes in skills, technique, and tactics to help them achieve their personal goals with fencing and to help develop life skills. Some fencers are motivated to compete at a high level in this Olympic sport; others are most happy to fence with their friends. I hope to develop a love for fencing that makes it a lifelong sport. At the early ages where I focus, my responsibility as a coach is to offer each fencer a solid basis for future success in good technique, to open the eyes of the parents as to the opportunities available, and to continue to work with the youth to develop advanced skills and tactics as they become more competitive. When I am coaching, a successful private lesson for me is that my student has fun, giggles, and learns some new skills.

Athletics is not just about physical fitness but also about learning the value of hard work, practice, focus, concentration, problem solving, and sportsmanship. It helps develop life skills necessary to balance extracurricular activities with other top priorities such as academics and family (and when older a career). Sports can help an individual build a sense of self-confidence. Having spent a year in teaching approximately 150 young physicians as a chief resident, I have an interest in learning theory and in methods of teaching highly intelligent and motivated individuals becoming more successful.
